One fundamental reason appears to be that it just isn't the practice for non-Negroes to mingle with their darker counterparts unless the latter are prominent or other wise successful. The practice of mingling is not condoned and to do so suggests to many people their automatic expulsion or ostracizing from their niche in society. There is the belief that if we stand too firmly or too often with the Negroes in their various causes, there will be an automatic identi fication with them which may eventually or inevitably endanger our secure acceptance by society. We are yet too new to this state of social acceptance, it is felt that we do not want to jeopardize our status to help other achieve theirs.
